JB (do you mind – shorter to type),

Following up on our discussion of your data analytics experience, CRE would benefit from a data tool that tracks growth in a highly visual way, like the flood waters rising in the tragic Texas flood of July 2025.

Here are two examples:

<https://static01.nyt.com/images/2025/07/07/multimedia/2025-07-07-texas-flood-animation-index/2025-07-07-texas-flood-animation-index-facebookJumbo-v7.jpg>

You can no doubt find the live map, showing hourly how the river rose. That's the model I'm talking about.

The second example, time lapse, begins to approach your objective:

Perhaps I'm way off base, but here's a report from CushmanWakefield's "Head of Quantitative Insights."

<https://www.linkedin.com/feed/update/urn:li:activity:7289642997166559232/>

I can't open the #links, so maybe Cushman's already doing this, but I doubt it. Please open one and let me know.

What you can perhaps create is a live graphic of CRE growth in each sector in cities across the country, say year-on-year, converting existing data into a "flood graph."

For example, WDCEP – Washington DC Economic Partnership – publishes each year:

<https://wdcep.com/resources/dc-development-report/>

which you can download for free.

On p.47, the report shows growth in MF like this:

Imagine if a city could capture this growth (and decline?) in each product sector. Sounds too simple?

Should we talk in case my request is not clear? Let me know when.
